1 Strangers and Friends: Collaborative Play in World of Warcraft

Virtual world, remote mobility?

World of Warcraft is an online multiplayer game with thousands of players at anytime. Players can interact with each other informally or in a structured way. The latter of which they are highly encouraged to participate by way of dungeons/raids/PvP to get the best items in the game. In order for them to assemble a party for raids, players can contact their friends on the friends list, ask guild members, or simply ask strangers. Collaborative play isn't necessary to reach the max level, but it is necessary in order to finish the story or to get the best items in the game.

The main way of communicating in game is by text-chat. It is possible to chat one-to-one, to the vicinity, to all party members, or to guild members.

2 "Did You Suspect the Post Would be Removed?" Understanding User Reactions to Content Removals on Reddit

TODO: learn linear regression model

Because having read the rules does not affect the perceived "fairness" of the removal it is clear that the rules are not clear enough.

The author does not conclude far enough. They conclude that applicable rules be displayed depending on what the user want to post. Which is fine, but the user should not be allowed to post at all, if automod would immediately remove the post. The user should be stopped and told which rules they were breaking (from personal experience, automod has removed: low effort title, no linking to certain sites, missing flair, etc).

Specific rules for subreddits that are in addition to common reddit rules should be highlighted to warn users of stricter moderation.

These measures would increase coordination between users and moderators/automoderators.

Removing post without notification was a serious concern in the article, and it gives the impression that this is common practice. But in reality that should not occur, and is a fault in the process or a shadowban. The latter means that the user has spammed the subreddit.
